What Old Kentucky Needs

THERE MUST BE A CHANGE

Politics and Prejudice Should Be Replaced By Reason.

THESE WORDS ENTITLED TO WEIGHT

Cincinnati Enquirer.

MAYSVILLE, KY., April 25, 1901.

To the Editor of the Enquirer: Kentuckians, during the last decade, have rapidly lost rank. Not alone from a moral standpoint, but politically and commercially. In this age of advancement, marked as it is on every side by broad and liberal men, there is no place for those whose leading characteristic is contentment with old ideas and measures, or prejudices against all that is new and up to date. Kentucky fans made rapid strides in intellect, culture and wealth from the day of Dan Boones' election to Congress until the days of Henry Clay and John C. Breckinridge. During that period the welfare of the state and the country at large was the chief aim of all legislation, state and National.

The advancement of the individual was a matter of secondary importance.

Since the close of the Civil War the welfare of the state, while it has progressed, has not, however, been fully appreciated. This progress, though, has been ignored, and the aggrandizement of the Nation first, and of a select few afterwards, seems to be the aim of our statesmen. Kentucky fought gallantly in the field of politics to maintain the doctrine of state rights, and the present Constitutional provision that should have been discarded long ago, provided she desired to keep pace with her sister states in the line of progress and "breast of the times." Bowie knives and brandy, revolver and race horses, are no longer necessary elements to the manhood of the individual, financially. Their possession no longer commands the respect or admiration of any one. Their use no longer indicates bravery or manhood.

Physical courage is an attribute common to the citizens of all states. Kentucky no longer has a monopoly of that quality. One Kentuckian can no longer whip three Yankees, but one Yankee, in a business transaction, can make it very interesting for three Kentuckians.

Times and conditions have changed, and the old Commonwealth must change with them. Politicians and statesmen who expect to become famous by denouncing corporate wealth and damning the views of the opposite party, must be relegated to the rear. The resources of the state must be developed, not for the wealth of individuals, but for the good of all. Capital must be encouraged to locate here. The wealth that is already here must be induced to remain. Corporations must be treated as fairly and equitably as individuals. Their usefulness must not be crippled by double taxation or excessive charges of any kind. They should not be subject to the control of inquisitors any more than an individual. In fact all such legislation is prompted by short-sighted politicians, who are posing as the friends of the common people, or are trying to make political capital out of their followers, and the result too often "kills the goose that lays the golden egg."

All great movements in the commercial world have been accompanied by combined wealth, either in the hands of corporations or of governments, governments themselves being the finest example. Many companies have been formed to carry on their operations, and the money raised has been used to build up the country.
